

Immortality

---

As he awakes sensations are slowly coming back to him. He feels like he is floating. He can't feel anything. A nurse comes over to him and asks him if he is alright. Name Robert for the man.

"You're recuperating after being in an accident."

Robert looks up at the man and says, "I don't remember what happened."

"No, you won't. It'll probably be a while before your memory comes back to you. The memories will only come back to you when you're able to deal with them. The worst thing for you would be to wake up and remember the trauma you went through. Far better to wake up with some piece."

"Was I hurt badly?"

"Yes, unfortunately. We nearly weren't able to save you. Most of your organs have been replaced. The important thing is that you are better now. Your body will work fine now as we've kept you unconscious while you healed. You're now free to leave when you feel up to it. If you don't there are facilities here where you can live for a while and we will have some of your things sent over from your house. For now I'll leave you to walk around and get back in to things again. I'll check on you again later this afternoon. If you have any questions just let me know."

Robert then gets up. He spends some time walking around the gardens of the hospital. He queries the net about what happened to him but can't find anything and presumes it's being blocked from him. So he decides to relax and enjoy things. He thinks he should tell his parents and brother when he gets out but for now it would be better left until he feels well.

[This such as computers should be discreet, rather than robots or anything.]

[It needs to include his thoughts around his friends and his realisation that his ex left him, although the emotion is kept out of it. Part of his body keeping him well.]

[He doesn't have any friends because he's cut himself off from them due to his separation.]

[No description of how things are done by tech' stuff. Avoid the Star Trek type stuff.]

The nurse comes to see him and checks that he is okay to go home and Robert says, yes.

When he gets home he starts to appreciate the loneliness a bit more. He doesn't have a job as jobs are just for fulfilment rather than for need to earn money. It's a way of keeping oneself occupied. He could be a tour guide for his area.

He goes to bed. Wakes up in the middle of the night, with the dream of his ex being around and he struggles to sleep. The next morning he sits down and has some breakfast and starts to contemplate his life. This where it starts to go down hill for him and he blames himself. By the evening he is very unhappy and is really down on his life.

Now he starts to think that he could not suffer another night and day like this and so he decides to end his life by jumping from his apartment window. He tries to sleep first but wakes up in the night again and this is when he gets the idea to throw himself out of the window. He looks at the stars and thinks, what the heck, I have nothing to live for and no one will miss me.

He opens the window and jumps out. [Describe the sensation of falling, the loud noise of the wind and how he's not expecting this.]

When he wakes up the next time things are very similar. His reactions are about the same. The difference is that there is not only a nurse there but also a psych' implying this is only the second time he has done it. The psych' says something about being there to help him deal with things and that the trauma of an accident is always good to have talked through.